

ATS TAC 6 Counterattack at Villers-Bocage - ATS Conversion 05/22/2006

VILLERS-BOCAGE, FRANCE, 13 June 13, 1944: Six days after the landing, in the sector reserved for the 2nd British Army, the 12th SS Pz Division and 21st Pz Divisions held the bastion of Caen too firmly to be taken frontal by the 1st British Corps. The decision was made to attack Caen from both sides, known as operation Perch. A little before 0900 hrs squadron B of the 4th County of London Yeomanry arrived, as a point element, at Villers-Bocage with a section of the motorized infantry 1st Rifle Brigade (called Green Jackets) and took up a position in the village. Squadron A continued to a position on the western slope of hill 213. The Germans decided to halt the encirclement. At 0915 hrs, a detachment of tanks from Schwere SS-Panzer-Abeitling 101 controlled by SS-Obersturmfuhrer Michael Wittmann and supported by Panzergrenadiers, attacked the British at Villers-Bocage. Benefiting from surprise, and after having destroyed a column of light vehicles on hill 213, Wittmann led the attack of 5 Tigers. Tanks and Grenadiers erupted into the village where a confused fight followed. The British tanks were destroyed one after the other. Overrun, the Green Jackets resisted as well as they could until the arrival of reinforcements of the Queens. But the very aggressive Germans were also reinforced by tanks of Panzer-Lehr. The fighting was house-to-house, and by the end of the day the pressure from the Germans forced the British to withdraw from Villers-Bocage. That evening, Bomber Command of the RAF crushed the village, which the Germans partially evacuated. The British attack to widen their bridgehead was stopped. They would make a new attempt two weeks later with operation Epsom. ASL Design: Jean-Luc Béchennec '90
